LOMPOC SNAPSHOT, 1964

Stan Tag

I stood on sunflocked pavement disguising my youth under black construction paper, my handlebar mustache curving into corners of a shaded doorway where my mother slept on a mattress tired, worn under the weight of my sister.

I wore
my father's sailor hat unaware of seaport women who whistle through their colored skirts, longing for the folds of my fat legs, and my sister

she cried
she cried through the shaded doorway, through the seaworn whistles and I lost my mustache rushing to see who she was.
